Carbide suture anchor fixation of suture-augmented human bone to rabbit femoral bone: a biomechanical study. To compare the biomechanical properties of augmented bone/suture anchors versus free sutures for fixation of human bone to rabbit femoral bone. Ten rabbit femora underwent dissection and augmentation of the central 50% of the cortex with human bone cement. Anchor (RigidFix, Conmed, Monroe, N.Y.) fixation was performed with 5-0 FiberWire in the central 50% of the cortex in 8 of 10 femora. Free sutures (5-0 FiberWire) were placed in the remaining 2 femora. Unfixated rabbits served as controls. Each femur was mounted in the mid-diaphyseal region with a custom axial-loading device, and 3-mm torsional loads were applied at a constant angular velocity. The ultimate failure load and stiffness were recorded and compared between groups. Average ultimate failure load was 2.2 times greater for the suture-augmented group than for the free-suture group (p 2 in every 1000 men aged 60 and over, and 1 in every 1000 women aged 60 and over, is a sufferer of dementia.
